everyone on the sniper team fired rounds to stay proficient and build on the long-range shooting skills already obtained.

With their time in Djibouti almost complete the sniper team is hoping to do more training with the French commandos to enhance their skills. In the future, they hope to be able to perform a night shoot and shooting from high angles down to the target, said the Marine sniper team leader.

With hopes of coming out to the range and shooting with the French again, the Marines and soldiers make their way back to Camp Lemonnier to share their experiences with others. For most, the experiences gained with different weapons systems here may some day save the life or the lives of people around them.

"I'll definitely hold on to the knowledge I gained out here," said Quinlan. "This was a once in a lifetime opportunity for me."

men are traditionally trained to sprint in open fields and dig fox-holes in dirt, many soldiers have felt a bit cramped away from open plains and terra firma.

"For the past month or so, my world has been roughly 300 yards long maybe 100 yards wide and maybe 6 or 7 decks high. That in itself is difficult," Cole said.

Despite the obstacles soldiers have faced in adapting to boat life, many say they are happy to have had the experience of the missions and training aboard the Wasp.

"I've learned that sailors are nice, and it's great to know these skills if we ever need them. We're doing training here that I've always wanted to do. I've always wanted to slide out of a helicopter," Au Buchon said.
